Report.

The aim of this report is to describe the attendance of museums and galleries. It is also based on collected data for three separate years of 2013, 2015 and 2017.

According to Social Statistics two main tendencies are tracked. The first one is that the attendance of British Museum, National Gallery and Tate Gallery has substantially increased since 2013 almost in two times. Another one is that the peak of visiting rate of Natural History Museum and Science Museum was in 2013, then it had been declining before 2015 when the rate started growing again. That means the attendance of these museums was accompanied by ups and downs.

Comparing National History Museum and Science Museum to the galleries, spending money or time on watching at pieces of art instead of historical or scientific exhibitions is more appealing to people. Moreover, generally the attendance of galleries and museums tended to grow dramatically in period between 2013 and 2015 more than in period from 2015 to 2017, except for National History Museum and Science Museum in connection with the fact that these particular museums introduced admission charges in 2014.

Due to Social statistics, I would strongly recommend to make some amendments in order to improve attendance of museums and galleries. As it has become evident through report that the price affects people's will to visit museums, it would be better to cut down admission charges. Additionally to this, to draw people's attention on art, science and history the museum boards of directors should introduce new kinds of entertainment, 3-D pictures for example, hence it will make them treat such places of interest more respectfully and with greater enthusiasm.

To conclude, undoubtedly the attendance of museums and galleries is increasing, however some improvements also have to be made.
